Sequence Justification

Six Traits: These ten lessons give an overview of the Six Traits, not only to familiarize students with the traits, but to bring them back to their remembrance at the beginning of each new school year.

Personal Narrative: This genre offers students a comfortable entry point back into writing, allowing them to delve into familiar topics they enjoy. It's straightforward and doesn't necessitate research, making it ideal for starting the year. Moreover, it fosters a sense of community within the class, as students share aspects of their lives with one another.

Narrative Summary: Introducing this genre second enables students to apply a new structural framework to their writing while still working within a familiar genre. Its versatility allows for repeated application throughout the school year.

Informative Report: Since informative reports require shared research, using November and December to teach this genre provides students and teachers with ample time to research a topic. The difference in structure for this genre may also require extra time.

Opinion Letter: Sequencing this genre after the informative report allows students to retain the report's structure, but explore a new tone and voice in their writing. The variety of letter writing also increases student engagement.

Informative How-to: This genre could also be called procedural writing. Having the prerequisite skill of sequencing from narrative and informative will aid students as they write this genre.

Opinion of a Book: Waiting until March to write an opinion of a book gives students time to increase their reading skills before applying those skills in a piece of writing.

Informative Summary: A follow-up to informative and opinion writing, this genre helps students refine their skills in breaking down and paraphrasing information which is a skill best used at the end of second grade when students have acquired more writing skills.

Fictional Narrative: Concluding the school year with fictional storytelling maintains student engagement, encouraging imagination and creativity. Additionally, it reinforces the structural concepts introduced earlier in the year, preparing students for revisiting narratives in the fall.

The suggested sequence is just one way to present the genres in Writing by Design. Schools and districts will also have success as they present the genres in a way that reflects their own pacing guides.
